"Choosing a Meaningful and Marketable Dissertation Topic" --Sponsored by the Graduate Education Committee [WORKSHOP]

Organizer: Stephanie Laudone, CUNY Borough of Manhattan CC
Panelists: Janet Zollinger Giele, Brandeis University; Craig Wiernik, Wilkes University

A dissertation topic has long-term implications on our academic career. It is related to career opportunities, publication possibilities, research ethics, and the potential for our own sustained future research interests. And yet, this is often a lesson in hindsight. Graduate programs do not offer much training in choosing the “right topic,” nor graduate students approach dissertation topic with a long-term vision. How may dissertation topics affect career paths after Ph.D.? What may be the things to consider, beyond the textbook tips on “scholarly significance and feasibility”? Should you collect primary data or use secondary data? This workshop will discuss strategies for choosing meaningful and marketable dissertation topics.

Navigating Sensitivities and Fear in Our Day Job: The Case of Gun Violence - Sponsored by the Committee on Community Colleges [WORKSHOP]

Presider: Robin Isserles, Borough of Manhattan CC

As sociology faculty, the material we cover can lead to a myriad of thoughts, emotions, and reactions from our students. Often, we find ourselves trying to explain concepts at a basic level for students who are unfamiliar (such as institutionalized discrimination, sexual and gender based-violence, poverty, homelessness), while being respectful of students who may be intimately linked to these topics of study. Navigating this terrain can be especially difficult in community college classrooms, where it is likely that students are members of vulnerable and marginalized populations. Moreover, as faculty fears of campus gun violence increase and there is heightened public awareness of campus mass shootings, another dimension is added to the complex nature of our role as sociology instructors. Now, we may not only worry about how our students will be affected by what we study, but we may also be concerned about our own safety as we cover sensitive material in class. In this discussion/workshop we will discuss our collective experiences dealing with potentially sensitive and triggering sociological topics and move to a broader discussion of the impact of recent (and even not so recent) campus gun violence. How do we navigate our own fears of gun violence on campus? of violent retribution by students? What is the emotion work needed to navigate these fears and sensitivities in the classroom setting? Sponsored by the Committee on Community College

Presiders: Barbara Katz Rothman, City University of New York (CUNY) Graduate Center; Wendy Simonds, Georgia State University
Discussants: Barbara Katz Rothman, City University of New York (CUNY) Graduate Center; Wendy Simonds, Georgia State University
Panelists: Moon Charania, Spelman College; Heather Dalmage, Roosevelt University; Vilna Bashi Treitler, CUNY Baruch College and Graduate Center; Wendy Simonds, Georgia State University
In this panel, discussants will engage with the shifting politics of US university life, specifically as it affects feminists in the discipline of sociology. A key paradox this panel will take on is how feminists scholars doing unconventional and queer work are negatively targeted by the new academic regime, while feminists working methodologically and theoretically within the domain of hegemonic academia are now often pitted against those working at the margins, doing non-normative methodological feminist work that queers disciplinary practices. Panel participants, who have earned their Ph.D's at various points over the past quarter-century, will tell about: their own personal struggles -- accommodations and resistances -- in the academy; their approaches to mentoring; their quests for feminist solidarity; and their work to remain sane as things fall apart. Participants are connected through a web of mentorship, that begins with Barbara Katz Rothman.
