172. Workshop: Mission Formidable: Landing Your First Job in Academia --Franklin

Do this! Don’t ever say that! Go on the market now. Wait a year. Anecdotal tips for job seekers are abundant in academia. But who should you believe? Which bits of advice will work for you? Should you try everything people have told you? Or maybe you should take a chance and adopt your own style? Thoughts and questions like these fill the minds of new academics everywhere as they begin to test the waters on the job market for the first time. While it might be impossible to quiet all of those fears and anxieties, it seems likely that the more we listen the more we will learn. This panel session offers plenty of information for new job seekers to listen to about landing that first job, from preparing a dossier to nailing the phone interview, and from pulling off the successful campus visit to negotiating the best offer. The hiring process can be daunting as it is filled with challenging scripts, roles and expectations, even for the most qualified candidates. Knowing what to expect may really be half of the battle. So if you have found yourself scratching your head about the right moves to make in this process, this session might be for you.

• Tell God I Quit: The Effects of Social Connectedness and Spirituality on Views of Suicide  Stevie Nichole Caronia, Elizabethtown College

ASA and the Center for Social Science Research at George Mason University created a digital archive of the American Sociological Review that includes manuscripts, reviews, information on authors and reviewers from 1990-2010 that can be scanned and analyzed by researchers. Unlike any other study of academic work, limited to published articles, this archive contains both published and unpublished manuscripts, so that archive users can study patterns of acceptance and rejection, frequencies of authors and reviewers who submit to the journal, their race/ethnicity, gender, and their network relationships. The archive contains a total of 8,441 manuscripts with attendant authors and reviewers. This workshop will introduce potential users to the digital archive, give examples of how to use it, and help participants to develop questions and techniques for analysis. This workshop is of interest to scholars who want to develop their ability to use a brand-new data set to study the history of sociology, the sociology of knowledge, intellectual history, the dynamics of formal organizations, social stratification, and most broadly, the ways power and knowledge interact to determine "what can be said" about a topic at any given moment. Specific Learning Goals: 1. Understanding the structure and content of the digital archive 2. Formulating research questions that can be answered using the digital archive (e.g.) * What intellectual orientations, major paradigms, and methods of the discipline became more or less visible during these important decades? 3. Learning how to answer specific research questions by manipulating variables and files in the digital archive

219. Workshop: Supporting and Mentoring LGBTQ+ Students --Winthrop

Due in part to an overall disciplinary approach of recognizing and analyzing diversities and inequalities, as well as specific attention to gender and sexuality issues in sociology courses devoted to these topics, LGBTQ students often contact sociology faculty for support. In this roundtable-style session we will provide some practical suggestions for ways faculty and graduate students can provide support and mentoring opportunities for LGBTQ students, as well as be aware and supportive of LGBTQ student organizations, events, and issues on campus. We invite other faculty and graduate students to bring their perspectives and suggestions, as well as undergraduate students to provide a first-hand perspective on what they would like to see in terms of support and mentoring.

286. Workshop: Revitalizing and Maintaining State Sociological Societies --Franklin
State-level (and sometimes multi-state) sociological societies have long been part of the discipline's organizational ecosystem; however, the FACT is sustaining such organizations and keep them vibrant is an obstacle due to limited human and fiscal resources. Yet, maintaining these local points of entry to professional engagement and socialization for academics, adjunct instructors, students and practitioners outside of the academy, who may be unable to participate in regional and national associations' activities, is essential. Come share your triumphs and challenges, successes and strategies in organizing and sustaining grassroots organizations at this facilitated conversation.
