- Nicole V. Amaya, American Sociological Association

33. Workshop: The Power of Social Control: The Importance of Training Employees in Consent --Seminar A

Knowledge and healthy practices around consent is one of those topics that we hope all people already possess on an interpersonal level--an unfair expectation when we consistently witness instances of sexual harassment and participate in a culture, knowingly or unknowingly, that normalizes sexual harassment (i.e. street harassment and common "romantic" tropes in television and movies). As such, understanding consent has become a necessary training session in all types of work-spaces that stems from larger systemic injustices related to sexism and racism--a culture that is also built in the institutions themselves and perpetuates deviant behaviors. As such, to truly address issues of consent we must establish a culture that is committed to acknowledging and combating the social and political structures that contribute to instances of sexual violence. This session aims to link theories of social control and deviance to the realities of rape culture in order to address questions of how to create training sessions that promote healthy consensual practices specifically in the work place.

38. Panel: How to Bring Your Sociological Expertise to Not-for-Profit Organizations (Sponsored by the Sociology Action Network-SAN) --Seminar A

The Sociology Action Network (SAN) is a new initiative of the American Sociological Association designed to assist and empower not-for-profit organizations by giving them access to pro bono experts in sociology. This presentation will describe what SAN is, why it was established, and how you can become involved in and benefit from SAN. The session will introduce the SAN initiative, address the principles that guide SAN projects and the motivations for becoming a SAN volunteer. It will then provide a brief overview of some best practices when working with community organizations to establish mutually respectful relationships that truly benefit the communities served while avoiding the pitfalls that can beset even well-intended efforts. Workshop participants will be invited to engage in a hands-on activity that will give them the opportunity to consider how they themselves might effectively engage with a local organization in need of sociological expertise, how that engagement would need to differ from engagements with students and colleagues in academia, and whether and how direct public engagement could benefit their own professional development and institutional standing.

49. Workshop: Beyond the Standard Grant: Funding Opportunities at the National Science Foundation --Freedom H

The National Science Foundation is using newly appropriated funds to support special programs including the Ten Big Ideas. Some of these programs are especially relevant to sociologists, including the Future of Work at the Human-Technology Frontier, Harnessing the Data Revolution, and Growing Convergence Research. Sociology Program Directors would like to encourage more scholars from our field to participate in these competitions. This workshop targets faculty and researchers who are willing to invest in interdisciplinary partnerships, which are often required. Representatives of NSF will discuss how these programs are organized and the review processes through which these large awards are made. The format will be interactive, allowing for audience questions and participation. NSF Program Directors will offer insights from other sociologists who have been on relevant panels and/or received such awards.

110. Speed Mentoring --Freedom E

Confused about the job market? Not sure how much to revise on that R&R? Never taught before and now have 3 preps? Well, as part of ESS's ongoing efforts to provide mentorship to students and junior faculty, we are launching a speed mentoring event at this year's meeting. We will be offering (tentatively) 7 themed tables, and each table will ideally have 2-3 faculty mentors. Mentees will go from table to table for those topics on which they would like information.
